

The Creator Paradox

Why is there something rather than nothing? Why does anything exist? People of fiction based religions say it proves there must be a creator because something just doesn't come from nothing, But when you ask them, "Well, who created God then?", they respond that God always was and always will be. If you push them on the issue the logic ends there. God works in mysterious ways, we can't comprehend it, and it's a sin to question the Lord. But if something can't come from nothing then an omnipotent creator can't come from nothing either.

The interesting thing is, if you assume that everything must have a creator then nothing would exist. Because the creator would need a creator and that would go on forever. So for some unknown reason, reality just exists. Is there a reason for this? Yes - there is. But what the reason is is something that we just don't know. And thus the creator paradox remains an unexplained mystery.
